The story is told in three kinds of chapters, about the psychologist's life, his teaching, and one patient, a stripper, who grabs his interest and reawakens his relationship with a woman he'd like to have married. Crying is the trail of blood that leads to the corpse in the bushes. The fact that the author, in real life is a therapist and a teacher at a local college. The "story" itself was a non-story. First novels, such as this is, published initially in hardcover are a bad idea, in this climate of frugality and underemployment. Tiffany, the stripper, is a difficult client with a lot of baggage, some of which at the beginning of the novel, the psychologist sounds conceited, but through growing to understand him I began to accept him more which parallels his emphasis on the importance of acceptance in therapy. It did appeal to me when it began.
