Also, occasionally, hilariously laugh-out-loud funny. It's too bad your cousin is dead! I mean maybe I still am I guess. Often in these stories, the woman speaking or describing or narrating has no self-protection. It was hard for her to talk to a young man, for instance, though the young man was clearly interested in.

I found these stories if "stories" is even the right word; they don't rely much in any way too much here to be too specific, and her stories aren't the type to be anthologized; it's almost impossible for me to proclaim specific stories "favorites" if I had to, "The Letter," at least, hurt me the. I particularly liked the stories that dealt with rural life, and often involved people from the city moving to or living in the countryside and dealing with the sometimes dark realities of life.
