I thought the main character's transition was well-done, and I loved the parts about Paris. I liked this book better at the beginning than I did going forward. I would not be like my father, with his ashen masks, I secretly told.

YamamotoYujiisdelightedtohaveYamamotoRyuseiashisson-in-lawandadopted. Set in Meiji Era Japan and France at the time of the Impressionists, the narrative reveals the protagonist's estrangement and isolation, first as an artist drawn to the West, which alienates him from his father and his traditional culture, as a Gay man, which alienates him from a straight The Mask Carver's Son, and as an Easterner in the West. Ryusei wants his son to follow in his footsteps and become a carver of Noh masks. What passages in the book indicate his feelings? Jan 20, Patty McCormick rated it it was amazing.
